Gender, Politics and Institutions
Towards a Feminist Institutionalism
Edited by: Mona Lena Krook, Fiona Mackay

Series: Gender and Politics

MONA LENA KROOK is Assistant Professor of Political Science and Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies at Washington University in St Louis, USA. She has written widely on quotas for women and minorities, and women and political representation. She is author of Quotas for Women in Politics (2009) and co-editor of Women, Gender, and Politics (2010).

FIONA MACKAY is Senior Lecturer in Politics at the University of Edinburgh, UK. Her research focuses on women and political representation, and gender and institutional change. Her most recent book is Women, Politics and Constitutional Change (co-authored 2007). She and Mona Lena Krook are founders and co-directors of the Feminism and Institutionalism International Network (www.femfiin.com).

Institutions – the formal and informal ‘rules of the game’ - profoundly shape political life. Political institutions are also gendered. This groundbreaking collection synthesizes institutionalism and gendered analysis taking a new approach, looking at feminist institutionalism in order to answer crucial questions about power inequalities, mechanisms of continuity, and the gendered limits of change. In this book, political scientists and sociologists from Europe, North America and Australia apply a feminist institutionalist approach to real world problems. These include candidate selection and gender quotas, political representation and legislative behaviour, welfare state policy making, the opportunities for gender equality in democratic transitions, women's movement engagement with multi-level governance, and the prospects for gender justice through new institutions of international law. The collection sets out a new research agenda on gender, politics and institutions.

Reviews:

"This superb book is one of those rare collections that moves a field forward. Scholars of institutionalism, for all their vital contributions to the social sciences, have given short shrift to inequality. Feminist social scientists have made inequality their core concern without an explicit analytical strategy to guide the study of norms and institutional practices. Krook, Mackay and their contributing authors, in building bridges between domains of scholarship that have remained separate for too long, open up a pathbreaking terrain for the study of feminist institutionalism."
